4.5 Stars & Gold Medal

The nose has a slight emphasis on coriander. Also Herbaceous Juniper, and a slight touch of citrus on the edges. The palate begins with fresh pine forest and lemon zest. Juniper is really the most striking thing about the palate. There's a lot of depth and complexity in the background notes. These notes include hints of violet, lemon, black peppercorn and fennel. The finish is dry, with still plenty of juniper. The residual notes of the palate include fennel seed and clover oil. ...and I thought it was quite an exquisite classic style gin. Really good on its own, but also with great promise for mixing. For gins which I don't have a full bottle of, I have a hard time awarding it full marks. But given the sample I tried, this could well be a five star gin. Really fantastic stuff. When I have a full bottle, I'm going to take a closer look at it. But this is really great stuff, as close as you can come to getting full marks without getting it. I just can't without trying it in several drinks to make sure. But I don't hesitate to recommend this gin strongly based on what I did have. Really beautiful stuff.

On the nose it has clean fresh lavender citrus, with plenty of coriander sitting beside the juniper.

To sip with ice- dry, with citrus and sweet anise followed with an aromatic and rooty dry linger.

Tonic opens up spicy notes (maybe a touch of clove), with a floral coriander middle and a dry linger, rounding it out to a very drinkable gin and tonic which, being controversial (to some) we would garnish with lemon and tomato. We think this would make an excellent southside, it would also be great in our chill ginfusion.

Full marks to Pickering and look out for it in on our next tasting menu.
